DTP (desk-top-publishing) and laser printers have allowed Cormorant to change its print face, format and size. It is hoped the new appearance will be received with approval. Contributors should now ignore earlier issues of Cormorant when setting out their manuscripts before submission.

Cormorant has gone through several changes since 1976, in its slow evolution from a bulletin of the Southern African Seabird Group, to an international journal of marine ornithology, accepting papers on seabirds from the whole world. However, no more changes are planned, at least for a long time.

I welcome the new members of the Editorial Board, whose combined expertise will help Cormorant "go global".
